Perry Exits Texas Stage Making a Case for His Past, and His Future

By BERNARD KASTEN
AUSTIN, Tex. — Gov. Rick Perry of Texas, who talked in the past about bringing his political career full circle, formally ended his presidential campaign on Monday in a speech to supporters here, saying he would return to the state%

Rick Perry made a spirited case for his re-election, arguing that Texas has become more prosperous and f tumbling — with home

Perry made a spirited case for his re-election, arguing that Texas has become more prosperous and broadly educated, and is better off than ever.

Texas has a strong economy and a high quality of life, he told supporters at a rally here.

“There’s a common theme in Texas today than any other state, because this is the best place in the world to light a job and grow a business,” he said. “And that’s why Texas is home.”

And while he said he’s not a strong supporter of the state’s current economic situation, he was making a good argument for why the state has a strong economy.

He also said the state has a strong education system.

On Monday, there was a widespread sense of relief in the state that Perry had made his decision.

The Texas governor had put off a decision on whether to run for president for several months, but in recent weeks he had signaled that he would not.

Perry made a spirited case for his re-election, arguing that Texas has become more prosperous and broadly educated, and is better off than ever.

Texas has a strong economy and a high quality of life, he told supporters at a rally here.

“There’s a common theme in Texas today than any other state, because this is the best place in the world to light a job and grow a business,” he said. “And that’s why Texas is home.”

And while he said he’s not a strong supporter of the state’s current economic situation, he was making a good argument for why the state has a strong economy.

He also said the state has a strong education system.

On Monday, there was a widespread sense of relief in the state that Perry had made his decision.

The Texas governor had put off a decision on whether to run for president for several months, but in recent weeks he had signaled that he would not.

Perry made a spirited case for his re-election, arguing that Texas has become more prosperous and broadly educated, and is better off than ever.

Texas has a strong economy and a high quality of life, he told supporters at a rally here.

“There’s a common theme in Texas today than any other state, because this is the best place in the world to light a job and grow a business,” he said. “And that’s why Texas is home.”

And while he said he’s not a strong supporter of the state’s current economic situation, he was making a good argument for why the state has a strong economy.

He also said the state has a strong education system.

On Monday, there was a widespread sense of relief in the state that Perry had made his decision.

The Texas governor had put off a decision on whether to run for president for several months, but in recent weeks he had signaled that he would not.